

THE MAGNETIC MAN · BONUS CHAPTER

The First 90 Seconds

Six situations where you always freeze up — written sentence by sentence so you know exactly what to say.

Situation 1 · Woman You Don't Know
Situation 2 · Colleague at Work
Situation 3 · Group of Friends
Situation 4 · On a Date
Situation 5 · Over Messages
Situation 6 · Restart After a Pause

Bonus Chapter · For personal use only · Do not redistribute

INTRODUCTION

The Gap Between Knowing and Knowing What to Say

You can understand the 7 Switches and still freeze up in the real moment. This bonus closes that gap.

The main e-book gave you the framework. You know why attraction works the way it does. But knowing the principle doesn't always help you in the three seconds before you open your mouth.

This bonus does something different. It takes six concrete situations — the ones men most often either avoid or mess up — and writes them out sentence by sentence.

Not as a script. You don't memorize these lines. You read them before the situation, and your brain stores the pattern. The tone, the pacing, the balance of tension and warmth. When the real moment comes, your brain doesn't look for words — it knows the shape of the conversation.

> "You don't need a script. You need a model. A model shows you the rhythm, and the rhythm is what your brain actually remembers."

How to use this bonus

Each situation has three parts:

— Setup — where you are, what's happening, what's at stake

— The conversation — a dialogue, annotated with what each line does and why

— The principle at work — which Switch is active and what makes it effective

Read one situation before you're likely to face it. Don't try to memorize. Just read it, notice the rhythm, and go.

SITUATION 1

The Woman You Don't Know

A coffee shop, a bookstore, a waiting room. She's there. You'd like to talk to her. You have about thirty seconds before the window closes.

Setup

You're in a coffee shop. She's sitting nearby reading something. There's no obvious reason to talk to her, which is exactly why most men don't. You're going to.

The fear: "I'll seem creepy. She didn't ask to be approached. She'll think I'm desperate."
The reality: A calm, brief approach with no neediness is almost always welcome. What makes it feel creepy is desperation — the long stare, the hovering, the inability to accept disinterest. None of that is happening here.

THE CONVERSATION
YOU	"Sorry to interrupt — you're reading [title/thing she has]. Is it any good?" (brief, specific, easy to answer)
HER	"Yeah, actually, it's really good." (positive — the door is open)
YOU	"I'm surprised. That genre usually drags after the first fifty pages." (callout — Switch 1: you have an opinion; you're not validating)
HER	"This one doesn't, though — it gets better." (now she's defending her choice; she's engaged)
YOU	"Okay, I'll give you that one. I'm [name], by the way." (concession + natural name exchange; warmth after the light tension)
HER	"[Name]." (the baseline is set — you're two people now, not a stranger and a target)

YOU (AFTER A BEAT)	"I'll let you get back to it. But tell me how it ends — are you here often?" (Switch 5: open loop; plants the next meeting without pressure)

The principle at work

- ✓ Switch 1 (Elimination): No compliment on her looks. You engaged with what she was doing.
- ✓ Switch 3 (Speech Tension): The callout created a brief, light disagreement — she had to respond.
- ✓ Switch 5 (Open Loop): Ending before the conversation ran out. Planting a future without demanding it.

SITUATION 2

The Colleague at Work

She's there every day. You've been "professional" for months. You'd like to change the dynamic. But you can't blow up your work environment.

Setup

She's a colleague — not your direct supervisor, not someone you manage. You interact regularly. The challenge is that the dynamic is already set: professional, friendly, safe. You want to shift it without creating an awkward situation you both have to sit in every day.

The mistake most men make: Either confessing feelings ("I really like you") which transfers all the pressure to her — or continuing forever in the same professional mode and hoping something changes on its own.

The correct approach: A gradual shift in tone and behavior, never in words.

THE SHIFT — OVER A NORMAL INTERACTION
HER	"I was up until midnight finishing the report." (normal complaint, expecting sympathy)
YOU (AVERAGE)	"That's rough, I'm sorry. Good job getting it done." (supportive, safe, zero tension — colleague mode)
YOU (SWITCH ON)	"Midnight? You should've just stopped at 11:30 and left the last page blank. No one reads to the end anyway." (playful callout — doesn't reward the suffering; suggests you have standards)
HER	"Are you serious? Of course they read it." (she's reacting — this is different)
YOU	"Maybe the first three paragraphs. Anyway — coffee before the 10 o'clock?" (shift from play to practical; this is an invitation without being a declaration)

The week-long approach

Don't try to change everything in one conversation. The shift happens over multiple interactions:

- ✓ Week 1: Add one playful comment per interaction — not about her, about situations
- ✓ Week 2: Invite specifically, not as part of a group ("coffee before the 10?" not "a few of us are getting lunch")
- ✓ Week 3: If she's consistently engaging back, add physical contact — brief, natural, not made into a moment
- ✓ If she stays in professional mode: That's data. Don't push further; focus your energy elsewhere

> "A colleague who thinks of you as 'just a colleague' needs to see different behavior before she can think differently. You can't say your way to a different dynamic. You act your way there."

SITUATION 3

The Group of Friends

She's a friend of a friend. You meet at a gathering. You want to connect — but everyone's watching, and it can't look like you're trying.

Setup

A party, a dinner, a house gathering. She's there through mutual friends. The social stakes feel higher because others are present — but that also means the context does a lot of the work for you. You already have social proof just by being there.

The mistake: Breaking off from the group to corner her one-on-one too early. It signals "I'm targeting you," which reads as either desperate or predatory.

The correct approach: Connect within the group first. Let her see you interact with others naturally. Then create a smaller conversation.

GROUP INTERACTION → SMALLER CONVERSATION
GROUP CONVERSATION	You say something to the group — a story, a joke, a comment. You're not performing for her; you're just participating. She observes how others respond to you.
NATURAL BREAK	When the group moment settles, you turn to her: "You looked skeptical just now. What were you thinking?" (specific, not generic — Switch 3: comment instead of question)
HER	"I wasn't skeptical, I was just thinking." (she's engaging — already slightly on the back foot)
YOU	"Same thing, in my experience." (short, confident close — invites her to push back)
HER	[laughs or pushes back further — both are good]

YOU

"What do you do when you're not being skeptical at parties?" (now you've earned the personal question — it's a continuation, not an opening interview)

Leaving on a high in a group context

At some point during the gathering, before the conversation runs out, say: "I need to make the rounds, but this was good — can I grab your number before I go?" It's direct. It's brief. It doesn't need a lengthy windup. And she's been watching you talk to other people all night, which already built the frame.

SITUATION 4

On a Date

You're already there. There's no "approach" problem. The challenge is what happens in the first fifteen minutes — before she decides whether she's interested or just finishing her drink.

Setup

You matched, you talked over messages, you set a time and place. Now you're sitting across from her. Most first dates fail in the first fifteen minutes — not because anything goes wrong, but because nothing goes right. The conversation is safe, symmetrical, informational: "what do you do?" "where are you from?" "do you have siblings?"

She's not checking whether you have a good job. She's reading whether there's any tension. Any electricity. Anything worth coming back for.

OPENING FIFTEEN MINUTES — WITH THE SWITCHES ON
ARRIVAL	Stand up when she arrives. Brief eye contact, short smile. "You found it okay?" — simple, low-pressure open.
FIRST FIVE MINUTES	Comment on something about the place or the moment — not her. "This place fills up fast for a Tuesday." Then let her respond. Don't rush to fill silence.
FIRST CALLOUT (5–8 MIN IN)	When she says something about herself, take the comment instead of the question: "You give me the feeling of someone who's very organized." Pause. She'll either confirm, correct, or laugh — all three are entry points.
HER	"Actually I'm really not. I'm kind of chaotic." (self-disclosure — she's talking now)

YOU	"Interesting. You hide it well." (short, slightly challenging — keeps the tension)
AROUND MINUTE 15	You've had a real exchange — not just an interview. Light tension, warmth, something she had to think about. Now you can go deeper: "What's something you're actually good at that surprises people?" The question earns the right to a real answer because of everything that came before it.

The moment she decides

Most women decide whether they're interested within the first fifteen to twenty minutes. What tips it isn't looks or money — it's whether she felt something other than comfortable. Not uncomfortable. Something unexpected. A small moment where she wasn't sure what was coming.

Switch 4 in action: create tension first (the callout, the challenge, the light uncertainty), then warmth (the concession, the real question, the moment you actually listen). In that order.

SITUATION 5

Over Messages

You have her number. Now what? The message window is the easiest place to lose someone — and the easiest place to fix what went wrong in person.

Setup

You met, you have her number, and now you're staring at a blank message field. The temptation is to open with something low-risk: "Hey, great meeting you" or a simple emoji. These messages say nothing. They receive nothing in return except "you too :)"

The first message after meeting is a first impression repeated. It confirms or breaks what she felt in person.

FIRST MESSAGE — SWITCH 5 IN TEXT FORM
GENERIC (KILLS MOMENTUM)	"Hey! Great meeting you tonight. Hope you got home okay 😊 " → Safe, warm, zero energy. She replies "you too!" and forgets.
WITH THE SWITCH ON	"Checked that restaurant you mentioned. The reviews are as divided as you were about it." [or: reference something specific from the conversation that was unfinished] → Shows you remembered. Shows you acted on it. Reopens a thread. She has to respond with something real.

The conversation over messages

A few principles that apply across every exchange:

- ✓ Match her energy on length. If she replies in three words, don't send three paragraphs. If she writes a full sentence, give her something to work with.
- ✓ End with an open loop, not a closed question. "Sounds like there's a story there" gets more than "what happened then?"

- ✓ Propose, don't wish. "We should get coffee sometime" sits in her inbox forever. "Are you free Thursday around 7?" gets answered.
- ✓ Don't be the last message every time. Some messages don't need a reply. Let the thread breathe.

ASKING FOR A DATE — DIRECT VS. HEDGED
HEDGED (WEAK)	"I don't know if you'd be interested, but would you maybe want to grab coffee at some point if you're free?" → Every word signals insecurity. She has to compensate emotionally before she even answers.
DIRECT (SWITCH 7)	"I'm free Thursday evening — come to [place], around 7." → You have a life. This is your suggestion. She either confirms or proposes another time.

> "A message that has a specific time, a specific place, and no apology for existing gets answered twice as often as one that doesn't."

SITUATION 6

Restart After a Pause

The conversation died. Messages went unanswered. Or you were in the friend zone for months and want to try again. Here's how to restart without making it weird.

Setup

Things went cold. Maybe you fell into over-texting and she stopped responding. Maybe you were always "just friends" and things never progressed. Maybe it's been a month with no contact and you want to try again.

The mistake here is starting with an explanation or an apology. "Hey, I know it's been a while, sorry for disappearing" makes the pause the subject of the conversation. She doesn't need a debrief. She needs a reason to re-engage.

RESTARTING A COLD THREAD
DON'T DO THIS	"Hey, I know it's been ages and I'm sorry for being MIA, I just had a lot going on, anyway how are you?" → This invites her to either forgive you or evaluate whether you deserved to disappear. Both put the past in the frame.
DO THIS INSTEAD	Pick something specific — a reference to a real thing, an observation, something happening in her world you know about: "Saw you're going to [event/city/etc]. How'd that go?" — or — "Found something you'd find either brilliant or annoying, depending on your mood." → No apology. No debrief. Just a resumption, as if the pause didn't need explaining.

Restarting from the friend zone

If you've been in the friend zone and want to shift the dynamic, the restart requires a behavioral change — not a message, not a conversation about feelings.

- ✓ Create space. If you've been available constantly, stop. This isn't a game — you actually start investing in other things. The change in availability is a real reflection of a change in priority.
- ✓ When you do reconnect: Interact the way you would with someone you're interested in, not someone who's already safe. Light tension. A specific invitation. Physical contact where natural.
- ✓ If she doesn't shift: Accept the data and move your focus elsewhere — genuinely. A man who can do this is attractive. A man who lingers hoping she'll change her mind is not.

> "You can't restart a dead conversation with the same energy that killed it. The restart only works if something actually changed — and the most powerful thing that can change is where she ranks in your attention."

NEXT STEP

Read the main e-book before your next situation.

The 7 Switches explain the why behind everything in this bonus. Understanding them makes these patterns automatic — not something you have to think about.